

Annotated Example: Family Finding Connections Log

Placement with kin can help children experience more stability and stronger connections to their family, community, and culture while in out-of-home care. If a removal does occur, agency staff can increase the likelihood that a child is cared for by kin in their initial placement by beginning to document information about possible kin connections early in an investigation. If a child is not placed with kin initially, creating a comprehensive list of connections can widen the child's support network and enable staff to build on earlier kin search and engagement efforts later.

The GPL created this annotated and adapted version of the Family Finding Connections Log for other jurisdictions to learn from and use. The tool was originally developed by ChildNet, the community-based care lead agency in Broward County, Florida, with support from the GPL.

This tool provides a single, centralized location for staff to record key information about a child's relational network throughout the life of the case. The Family Finding Connections Log prompts staff to ask about a wide range of potential relationships, including paternal family, sibling parents, and fictive kin relationships. Staff can reference and add to this tool during case planning or hand-off meetings as well as during conversations with parents, children, and family members. This tool also helps staff preserve and share information across case hand-offs. The following pages include ideas on how to introduce and use a Family Finding Connections Log and a fictionalized example of what it could look like for staff to use this tool in practice.

"The log can be really helpful for both our staff and families. A lot of families will say 'We don't have anyone,' but then their answers change when staff get specific. Introducing the log showed staff that making kin placements is a top priority for us."

Program Officer of Case Management & Adoptions at ChildNet, Broward County, Florida

1. Listing many relationships encourages staff to explore a broad range of potential placement options and build a network of support for the child(ren) — rather than just identifying a single placement option.

2. This list format may be easier and faster for staff to use than genogram tools or software, which may be more complicated or feel intimidating.

3. Sometimes, a child's paternal side may not be explored as deeply as their maternal side. These prompts can encourage more comprehensive kin searches up front and be used as a guide during conversations with parents.

4. This tool prompts staff to ask about a range of fictive kin, including godparents, coaches, friends' parents, or neighbors. This is especially important for teens, who may have strong relationships with supportive but unrelated adults.

5. Staff can add brief notes about the nature of each relationship. This could include potential barriers to placement, when to follow-up, or other ways that individual could play a role in the child's life beyond placement, such as providing respite care for a potential caregiver, helping with transportation, or providing academic support.

6. This information can be handed off to staff throughout a case — from initial investigative staff to ongoing case workers — to continue building and reaching out to connections, with a goal of eventual kin placement.

Tips for Introducing a Family Finding Connections Log

- Before using the log, solicit feedback from staff and managers on how it may enhance existing kin search practices. Consider: How is information on kin connections currently documented and shared? How might a tool like this strengthen kin search efforts and case hand offs? Are there any relationship types missing from this list?
- Collaborate with staff to establish clear protocols and processes for use. Consider: Who will be responsible for initiating the log? Where will the document be saved so everyone has access? How will the document be updated over time? How will information be handed off to subsequent case workers?
- Pair the introduction with applied training and discussion. Work with staff to practice having conversations about extended family and fictive kin relationships listed on the log by asking questions like, “Who was at the child’s last birthday party?” or “Who do you sit by at church?” For more ideas, download our Family Conversation Guide.

Below is a fictionalized example of how staff may use a Family Finding Connections Log in practice. Note that this is only one illustrative example, and agencies can adapt this tool to meet their specific needs and internal processes.

The Government Performance Lab, housed at the Taubman Center for State and Local Government at the Harvard Kennedy School, conducts research on how governments can improve the results they achieve for their citizens. An important part of this research model involves providing hands-on technical assistance to state and local governments. Through this involvement, we gain insights into the barriers that governments face and the solutions that can overcome these barriers. By engaging current students and recent graduates in this effort, we are also able to provide experiential learning.
